Dear Friends:

Many of you have seen this story on the news...

At long last, Louis Haros of Fresno, California can take down the ragged American flag he vowed to fly until his son returned from Iraq.

The happy news follows months of controversy, in which some of Haros' neighbors asked him to remove the flag because it was too tattered.

But Louis, a Vietnam veteran himself, would not budge. He had made a vow to his son Paul, and he was determined to keep it until the young man completed his second tour of duty.

"I understand a lot of people's feelings. But they've got to understand my promise to my son," Louis told KMPH, the Fox News affiliate for Central San Joaquin Valley.

Not everyone in the community was critical of the Haros family's flag. Some people stopped by to offer support and drop off a new flag to use after Paul's safe arrival.

Corporal Paul Haros arrived home on August 6 after 11 months in Iraq, and he helped his dad replace their old flag with a fresh symbol of patriotism and inspiration.

"My father became very emotional about keeping that flag up, and it meant a lot to me that he stood up for it, and for me," Paul told the Fresno Bee.

Kind of makes me think twice about how much love I have for my father and kids. I show them every second I can. But somehow, it is still never enough. There can never be enough time spent loving, being with, or appreciating the many wonderful people we have in our lives. Nurture your relationships and hold on to them with both hands.

‘Nuf Said.
